

On development of the Japanese model of global human resources based on diverse foreign language education

Toshinobu USUYAMA, Kunitoshi HISHIKAWA, Sei MATSUSHITA

This study provides a detailed analysis of the process of developing a Japanese model of global human resources at the age of our rapidly globalizing society. Global human resources are defined as individuals with strong human and social skills, who have mastered creative problem solving skills and gained ability of overcoming difficulties. Such individuals will engage in activities aimed at achievement of sustainable prosperity and growth. In addition, the importance of foreign language education in the process of fostering global human resources is discussed, with the focus on strengthening creativity and respecting human and cultural diversity.